They Got Rich Off Uber and Lyft. Then They Moved to Low-Tax States.

Meet the semiretired millennials who left California for low-tax, low-stress places like Texas, as their former start-ups stampede toward the stock market.

J.T. Forbus, a tax manager at Bogdan & Frasco in San Francisco, said he has been fielding more questions from tech workers about how moving out of state could help sidestep high taxes, especially as their companies stampede toward the stock market. Many tech workers are compensated with stock, which is generally doled out over four years but can trigger a hefty tax bill when it “vests,” or is earned, and when it is sold.

“It seems to be a question that kind of pops up when an I.P.O. is happening and someone has substantial shares and could have millions of dollars coming their way,” Mr. Forbus said.
